FEMALE COLLEGE ADVANTAGE 57

rates for men and women could affect gender gaps in wages, labor force participation, and a host of other labor market outcomes (Bernhardt, Morris, and Handcock 1995). The rising proportion of college-educated women relative to men could alter trends in educational assortative mating, as more women marry down, delay marriage, or forego marriage altogether (Lewis and Oppenheimer 2000). These changes, in turn, may have an impact on family formation and parenting (Bianchi and Casper 2000). In addition to these broad social implications, the gender gap is causing concern among college administrators, who worry that the gender cific subpopulation (e.g., low-income secondgeneration immigrants in New York City [Lopez 2003]). In contrast, this is the first study to assess broadly the causes of the growing female advantage in college completion with nationally representative data for the United States. Additionally, it pays careful attention to how the female-favorable trend varies for different social oriein and racial groups. temaic-tavorable trend varies for different social origin and racial groups. In a recent paper (DiPrete and Buchmann 2006), we show that the value of college completion in terms of its combined impact on labor market earnings, marriage, household standard of living, and insurance against income depri-
